The Tale of Fitch's Bluff and How It Was Called.

Thomas Fitch, spellbinder in ordinary and bluffer extraordinary, made an offer to bet $1,000 on Friday, was called, and

For two weeks The Herald has had placed with it $1,000 to bet that McKinley will not carry Utah, and the offer has been posted in The Herald window. On Friday Mr. Fitch got a check certified for $1,000, and after waiting some hours until all the banks were closed, came into The Herald office, accompanied by a Tribune reporter. He said he wanted to take up the bet. He wanted it covered with cash or a certified check, and nothing else would do. He confessed that there might be difficulty in getting that amount of coin from any bank at that hour of the day, and admitted that no one could certify a check so late in the day, but he insisted on one of these two impossibilities.

When told that The Herald would be pleased to have him leave the check with the Tribune to be covered by a Herald check, he said he might change his mind before that could be done, and drifted out, saying he was in a hurry to catch a train for Provo. When he was urged to leave his check so it could be covered in the short time necessary, he smiled a wan smile and said he might hear something at Provo that would lead him to change his mind some more.

Ten minutes after Mr. Fitch's spectacular bluff a bank was lecated that had not closed its vaults, and a seeker for Fitch found him employed in leisurely conversation with a friend at the Deseret bank corner. He was told the money he sought so anxiously was ready for him at The Herald office, half a block away, but his wan smile flitted over the sad features again and he said he really couldn't take time to drop into The Herald office on his way to the train. If he didn't change his mind again he would come in Saturday morning and put up his check. Later Mr. Fitch sent the Tribune man up to ask that nothing be printed yesterday about his bluff, and The Herald granted that cour-

Yesterday Mr. Fitch passed by The Herald office, looked at the $1,000 bulletin, smiled that sad smile and passed on. He wasn't looking for any bets-and wasn't the day before. The Herald's offer is still good.
